Venezuela on alert as counter-protesters take to streets Published duration 4 April 2017 Related Topics Venezuela crisis image copyright EPA image caption Thousands of demonstrators and counter-protesters took to the streets of Caracas on Saturday Venezuela's government has gone to unusual lengths to counter anti-government protesters by sending in military troops and sealing off public areas to keep them away. Despite some setbacks, many of the protests continue - and at one point last week members of the crowd attacked a military base, declaring it "the base of the dictatorship". The government says several people have been killed in violence. Mr Maduro says he will not quit, and that he has the support of the military and the people. What's happened in recent days? The unrest in Venezuela has its roots in a move by the opposition-led National Assembly to pass a law which puts referendums and elections in the hands of a newly-created electoral council. Critics say that the vote, scheduled for 3 May, is a way for Mr Maduro to stay in power without elections. The government has blocked access to internet and television news since the decree was announced, as well as taking steps to block opposition politicians from holding meetings. image copyright AFP image caption Thousands of protesters turned out in Caracas on Saturday On Tuesday, Mr Maduro said he was considering calling a referendum on a "painful" term in office for himself in response to the anti-government protests, though he has not yet made that announcement. His vice-president also weighed in on Saturday, saying Mr Maduro - whose powers as president have been reduced since he was declared "acting president" - would stand again in the next election. Earlier, Mr Maduro said he had the support of the military. "The military, the armed forces, the social revolution are with me, fighting today for a free Venezuela," he said in an hour-long speech on state TV. What's the reaction been? The US government has condemned the violence and repression, saying both sides must be held responsible for any deaths. Leading opposition figure Henrique Capriles said security forces had fired on protesters, and opposition MPs had video evidence. media caption Footage shows clashes between protesters and security forces during a protest in Caracas The head of Venezuela's armed forces said that clashes on Thursday and Friday were started by members of the opposition.

Q: Doing something with every line in a text file using Java I have a java.util.Scanner on a text file. The text file contains many lines. I need to take each line, do something to it, and save it to another file. What is the easiest way to do this? EDIT After thinking about it some more, my text file looks like this: line1 line2 line3 I need to pass each line to a function. That function should do something to the line, and save the line to a new file. The new file should contain only one line. A: Yes, you need a for loop, which iterates through each line. For example, // Replace the line below with your own code to read a file String aFilePath = "C:\\Users\\data.txt"; // Define a scanner to read from the file Scanner in = new Scanner(new File(aFilePath)); // Iterate through each line and call the function for (String line; in.hasNextLine();) { doSomething(line); outFile.write(line); outFile.flush(); } A: try (Scanner in = new Scanner(new File("file.txt"))) { while (in.hasNextLine()) { String line = in.nextLine(); // do something File outFile = new File("output.txt"); try (PrintWriter out = new PrintWriter(outFile)) { out.println(line); } } } The output of this would be in a file called output.txt. If you don't want to create a new file for each iteration, then you would need a separate class for reading the file and saving it to a variable, and a separate class for writing the lines to the file. class Reader { private Scanner sc; public Reader() { this.sc = new Scanner
